Law, Economics, and Public Policy: Essays in Honour of Michael Trebilcock

The hallmark of Professor Michael Trebilcock's scholarship is his combination of rigorous economic analysis with a deep-seated humanitarianism and commitment to social justice. He has brought his unique blend of analytical skills to bear on a wide range of topics, including competition law and policy, immigration law, international trade law, and law and development, and he has had a profound influence on generations of students and Canadian society at large.

In celebration of Professor Trebilcock's career and his extraordinary contributions to legal scholarship and law reform, this issue of the University of Toronto Law Journal is devoted to articles by leading scholars in each of the focal points of his work.

The issue is edited by Professors Anita Anand, Tony Duggan, Colleen Flood, and Ed Iacobucci.

The University of Toronto Law Journal, founded in 1935, is the oldest university law journal in Canada. It continues to represent the broad and visionary approach to legal scholarship which was initially announced by W.P.M. Kennedy, the first editor of the Journal, when he ventured the hope that its publication would foster a knowledge of comparative laws 'not merely as substantive or adjectival systems, but as expressions of organized human life, of ordered progress, and of social justice.'

UTLJ publishes the work of the most internationally well known scholars, not only in the law, but also in the broad range of disciplines relating to the law, such as economics, political science, philosophy, sociology, and history.
